"For many that rely on philanthropy...this is not just a tough year. This is going to be a tough era." So counsels Patrick Rooney, Director of the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University. In 2011 charitable giving rose by 4 percent; however when adjusted for inflation growth was a mere 0.9 percent. Across the subsectors of charitable giving growth was modest and when adjusted for inflation virtually flat; the two exceptions were bequest giving and giving to international organizations. While giving to religion remains the largest recipient of charitable dollars, the bar chart below reveals a sobering truth: giving to religion is the one subsector that has seen decline in the last two years.
What sits behind this decline in religious giving? While for the moment there are no clear answers, there are storm clouds bearing a watchful eye as religious giving is a barometer of larger cultural issues.

- The decline in both church attendance and formal institutional membership.
- The generational shifts in religious practice, participation and styles of giving.
- The dominance of large congregations as the church of choice of attendees: the larger the congregation the greater the number of "free riders" - people who attend but do not give.
- The silence of religious leaders and congregations in talking and teaching about the faithful use of possessions apart from the annual obligatory stewardship or giving sermon.
• The failure to adapt best fundraising practices to congregational life, leaving congregations dependent on an outmoded, one-dimensional approach to giving.

Creating Congregational Cultures of Generosity

Through presentation, small group and individual exercises, and a high degree of interaction, participants imagine and design their own plan for creating cultures of generosity in their congregations. Public programs are currently planned for DuPage County, Illinois and Montreat, North Carolina.

In this seminar you will discover how to:

• Analyze the giving culture of your congregation,
• Adapt the latest research findings on religious giving to your unique church setting,
• Expand the ministry of pastoral care to include care for donors,
• Transform the way you and your congregation talk about money and giving,
• Develop an effective, comprehensive and multi-dimensional plan for fundraising,
• Integrate best practices of fiscal transparency and internal accountability,
• Experience the dynamic joy of shared inquiry with fellow participants of faith,
• Create a congregational culture that inspires generosity.
